Observation and Application: Supporting Creativity

There are many different experiences and materials that can be offered to help infants and toddlers develop their creativity. As an infant or toddler caregiver, it is important to observe each child carefully and learn from families in an effort to determine how you can adapt an experience to meet the child’s needs.

Take time to observe an infant or toddler in your care and provide responses to the items and questions below:

What did I observe?

- In what ways does the existing environment support this young child’s creativity? Is there anything I could change in the existing environment to better support this young child’s ability to explore and experiment?
What have I learned from this child’s family about creativity?

Review the curriculum you use and identify two experiences and the materials to support these experiences that will help support the infant or toddler’s creativity. If you cannot find any experiences, design two of your own.
